LOUISA HIGGINSON CABOT

There are people in whom the Lord seems to have put so much of nature, human and divine, that the rest of us seem pale and diluted in comparison; there are people by whom every duty is performed with a spirit and an adequacy that gives no suggestion of effort, but is the evident expression of a generous and abundant nature; there are those who, whatever the weight of care, or of the daily task, have strength so to bear it that, to family and friends and to strangers alike, their air and presence is one of order and tranquillity. Emerson said, "Our virtue is a fuss, sometimes a fit." Mrs. Cabot's goodness was as steady as the sun. And it had in it the same sort of vital warmth; a warmth of love; underneath, too, one knew there was the power of wholesome wrath; and, behind great reserve of speech, an inflammable and enthusiastic spirit capable, on just occasion, of an even reckless self-forgetfulness. Conservative in outward things, she was an utter radical in obeying the promptings of her heart; sending her eight children away that she might nurse a servant through an attack of typhoid. Her courage was a trait not uppermost as one thinks of her, because it was courage of that quality that gives the spectator no sense of a struggle; resulting in entire disregard and utter reticence as to her own sufferings and sensations. And, as must be with those who are of the true salt of the earth, there dwelt, deep in all that warmth and wholesome nature, a never-failing sense of humor, an essential part of the mellowness and entire sanity of all her words and looks and thoughts.

— Joseph Lee.

FRANCIS CABOT

A careful observer and a thoughtful student, a man of childlike simplicity and directness, unhampered by the slightest tinge of vanity or self-seeking, his judgments were invariably keen, generous, and sound, his sympathies sincere and broad.

His power of enjoyment was so rich, his interests so real, his sense of joyfulness so independent of purely personal considerations, that his own trials and regrets were easily transcended, and he could "live ever in a new day." Up to his seventy-third year his life had been continuously that of a hard-working, upright business man, a good citizen, and an unfailing friend to the large circle who depended on him for counsel and for help. His health was still excellent, and he might have remained at his post until his death, but that in the autumn of 1897 he became totally blind. Yet so genuine and so essential had his enjoyment been of every pleasure that the eyesight brings, - of natural scenery, his books, the faces of his children and his friends, - that the strong current of his thought continued to flow on with undiminished vigor in the wonted channels, and, to the grateful astonishment of his friends, no murmur was ever heard, no word even, calling attention to his loss. Instead of these there were constant references, and outbursts of pleasure and appreciation, which showed that the beauty of the changing season, and even the forms and faces of the grandchildren whom his eyes had never seen, existed for him, clothed with color and individuality and warm with life.

His visual memories and fancies were so definite, and so precious a possession, that he would not allow them to be dimmed by the reflection that their actual verification was no longer possible. And as in this respect, so it was in others. It was always that which he possessed, and most of all the sunshine and affection by which he was surrounded and which he himself inspired, that alone was real to him. It was an essential part of the beauty of Mr. Cabot's attitude and conduct that they were so spontaneous and so simply natural as not to be felt, either by him or any one, as a cause for praise.

His action won such reverence sweet
As hid all measure of the feat.

— Written by his son-in-law,
Dr. James Jackson Putnam.
